In addition to the bombs, Franch had upon him a revolver, a long knife and a bottle of poison, having planned to use the weapons should there be any danger of his capture, and to swallow the poison if his capture seemed inevitable.

Franch described with flashing eyes and the manner of a stage hero how he took his place in the second galiery and glanced around, carefully noting the large audience assembled, paying particular attention to a group of ladies in evening dress, who were chatting gayly together between the acts and whose many sparkling jewels seemed to denote that they belonged to the wealthiest and most aristocratic portion of the community.

It was into this crowd of happy, laughing people that the Anarchist resolved to hurl the bomb.

Franch then told how he waited quietly until the opera was nearly finished and when all eyes were fixed upon the stage. He then moved into a passage where nobody was likely to observe him and, he said:

'Taking a bomb in each hand I hurled one of them with all my force into the centre of the closely packed stalls where that group of select people was sitting, and a fine explo.ion followed the landing, and a fine explo.ion followed the landing the poison and there are to tought and from the particular force on Whelan's right event as if shot, and was carried into Gantando's store, unconscious.
